INTRODUCTION

The goal for this research session was to research the Levesque, Desjardins, and Marquis ancestral lines of the client as far as time and records allow.

FRENCH-CANADIAN RECORDS

For this project research consisted of French-Canadian genealogical records. One of the foremost commonly utilized sources for genealogy research in Québec are parish registers. Most parish registers have been preserved from 1621 to the present.

Civil registration was not begun until 1994 and is not a federal jurisdiction. These records vary depending on the municipality or parish and one may experience records that never existed, have been destroyed, or may have disappeared before they were digitized. For records after 1900, only the person named in the record or that person's legal representative can gain access to them.

There are some difficulties with French-Canadian research. It is possible that the parish or town had a name and/or designation change. For some municipalities, the classification method within the register may have varied. Thus, the records may be in disorder, for 1786-1788, etc. Also, if there is no exact date for an event, research must be done page by page seeking the individual. The records are in French and sometimes the act is difficult to read because of the handwriting or the image is unreadable due to the poor image quality. Finding the actual name of an ancestor is sometimes one of the most difficult things to do.

Maiden Names

In the United States, it was quite common for a woman to take on the name of her husband, making it difficult to know the wife's identity and familial origins. In Québec, however, a woman generally used her husband's name in social settings, but was always referred to by her maiden name in official documents. This helps when tracing an individual's maternal line.

Spelling Name Variations

Spellings of surnames were not standardized until very recently. With their silent letters, French surnames especially lend themselves to a wide variety of spellings. When French-Canadian families moved to English-speaking areas, they may have translated their names into English, or modified spelling such as Roy becoming King or Petrowski becoming Peterson.

Compound Names

Compound given names, such as Jean-Luc, Jean-Paul, or Anne-Sophie are not uncommon. These are not considered to be two separate given names. The second part of a compound name may be a given name normally used by the opposite sex. However, the gender of the compound is determined by the first component.

“Dit” Names

A “dit” name is basically a nickname or alias, which is typically added to a surname. The use of “dit” names started in France with the military.¹ An individual could also use a “dit” name to differentiate themselves, or their family, from someone else with the same name. A person’s name is built like this:

- Pierre Beaugrand dit Champagne
- Pierre is the given (first) name
- Beaugrand, is, in this case, the patronym or ancestral family name
- Champagne is, in this case, the “dit” name

“Dit” names can be legally used to replace the original patronym, so one can find the same person known under a nickname or secondary surname at any time, for no particular reason:

- Pierre Beaugrand
- Pierre Champagne
- Pierre Beaugrand dit Champagne
- Pierre Champagne dit Beaugrand

LEVESQUE SURNAME

The Levesque surname is French, from the Old French eveske ‘bishop,’ Latin episcopus, with the definite article l(e), an occupational name for a member of a bishop’s household.² It is the most frequent of several alternative spellings in French Canada. Surname variations: Levis, Legendre, Lesesne, Levee, Revere, Lavertu, Frisque, Leveille.

Per U.S. censuses, the Levesque family was found in the United States and Canada between 1880 and 1920. Maine had the highest population of Levesque families in 1880.

CENSUS RECORDS

Census records are easily acquired, and are the backbone of genealogical research, as they provide information regarding race, gender, age, year and place of birth, parents' places of birth, occupation, wages, parents' names, the identity of children, neighbors, and even addresses. For this reason, they are often the first records searched when starting research. However, census records also have potential flaws; for example, errors sometimes occurred when the enumerator miscopied information to the final form, or if the individual responding to the enumerator was difficult to understand. Other potential snags could happen if the enumerator neglected to ask certain questions or made assumptions, or if the person who provided the information was a child or a neighbor with only partial knowledge of the family. Finally, sometimes the respondent intentionally provided false information or neglected to provide complete and accurate data.

By comparing data from multiple census enumerations across an ancestor's life, we can gain insight into where he was born and when, where he believed his parents were born, and who his children were. In addition, elderly family members are often found living with their younger relatives in later censuses, and occupational information can be valuable in distinguishing between men with the same name in the same area. It is important to understand that the census information was provided to the enumerator by whoever was home—the head of the household, a child, and sometimes even a neighbor. For this reason, it is not uncommon to find minor discrepancies in birth years and locations, and the data gathered from census enumerations must be taken into consideration with other evidence.

Mexilia Levesque died 9 December 1919 in Sainte-Flore, Grand'Mère, Champlain (currently Shawinigan, Mauricie), Québec, Canada. While the date of death for Mexilia was not proven, she died before 1920 and according to the marriage of Desire and Mexilia's daughter, Lorette Levesque, at the time of Mexilia's death, she resided in Canada, not Nashua like Lorette's father, Desire.³⁸ There was some conflicting information, as the ages at death for Lorette's parents did not match their birth years. The informant may not have known when Desire and Mexilia were born and may have guessed their ages at death.

CONCLUSION

Over the course of this research session, many details were uncovered regarding the lives of the client's Levesque, Desjardins, and Marquis ancestors.

Documents were collected, organized, verified, and explained, and family relationships were established through Paul Michael Levesque's 2x great-grandparents. The 3x great-grandparents of Paul Michael Levesque have not yet been pursued, but research looks very promising. These lines could be a future project.
